[.] Suddenly a long, shrill whistle was heard. That's your train, girls, said Mr. Harlowe, who with Mrs. Harlowe, Mrs. Nesbit and Mary Pierson had drawn a little to one side while their dear ones said their last farewells to their four boy friends. The circle about the three girls closed in. The air resounded with good-byes. The last kisses and handshakes were exchanged. Reckless promises to send letters and postcards were made. Then, still surrounded, Grace, Miriam and Anne made their way to the car steps and into the train. Grace clung first to her mother then to her father. How can I do without you? she said over and over again. Tears stood in her gray eyes. She winked them back bravely. I'm going to show both of you just how much I appreciate going to college by doing my very best, she whispered. Her father patted her reassuringly on the shoulder[.].
