Excerpt: . . . j3 The following LINES were-written at an early period and designed for another lady; but a poets, as well as lovers, are allowed a little freedom and permitted to indulge in fiction, the author hoped he might in this one instance, be excused for following a general example, and by a little piouj fraud, appropriating them to the person, while he offered them for the entertainment of Nevissa. N the broad surface of th Atlantic wave, Which oer its coast its foaming billows lave, There is an isle not quite unknown to Fame, A little spot, Dominica its name. Pure is its atmosphere, its lky serene, Save where a raging hurricane be seen; For then pale terror lifts its mighty hand, And ruin desolates the planters land; At nineteen years of age. Who sees whole fields in lofty whirlwinds toft, His works destroyd and...
