The Church of God, my Brethren, is at all times so glorious; - so varied are its beauties, whether they arise from persecution and tribulation, or from exaltation and prosperity, that there is no age, there has been no time, in which these words could not have been spoken to the existing Church - of which it could not be said that they who had gone before, or they who should come after, would have gladly lived to have seen the wonders which God had wrought at that particular time. Who for a moment can doubt that a Jerome or an Augustine, when he paced the silent catacombs, and saw there the records of the glorious and noble days of martyrs triumphs, felt like the soldier who had been withheld from the battle, and who would gladly rush into the fray, and win those laurels, even at the risk of life and limb? They envied those who beheld the noble contests of the Lawrences and the Agneses, and saw the Church, in her humiliation indeed, but still in the prime of her strength, and of whom they were in some sort jealous.
